THERE would seem little reason to doubt the sincerity of the Czar's expressions of indignation at what has occurred in the Pamirs. ALEXANDER III. has always shown himself solicitous for the preservation of peace. He may at heart perhaps cherish a desire to see the dream of PETER th GREAT carried into effect, but he is in no hurry, and would vastly prefer to see the attainment of the objects of Russian ambition effected by pacific means to a war of aggression, however glorious, however successful. This has been proved by the calm equanimity or philosophy with which (Friday) at Causeway Bay. the Antocrat of all the Russias has witnessed the checks imposed on Muscovite designs in the Balkan penincula, especially by Bulgaria, the principality most counted on to further them. It may be doubted whether an invesion of India has over been seriously intended, but the idea has served its purpose; namely, to weaken British enthusiasm on behalf of the Turk. An invasion of Chinese Turkestan is, however, not only possible but practicable. and it would also be a mission to recover what religion to recover lost ground, and they will never rust until the province of. In another column we reproduce from a Yokohama contemporary an article on Footbinding in China. There is, perhaps, nothing very new in these remarks, but we are glad to find another protest against a custom which is as cruel as the grave, because while being inhuman in its infliction of torture, it is barbarous as a reflection on the woman. wards. For all that can be said, however, no change 117 is likely to be effected, we fear, in this respect for years, perhaps generations, to come. Even an Imperial Edict would not at firs suffice to kill the custom. In no country do ancient customs die so bard as in China, and this is so intimately allied to many social usages and habits that he would be bold reformer who would even attempt to attack it. Even in this British Colony the abominable custom is practised, and numer. ous children are daily tortured in order that they may be prepared for the marriage market. On August 30th I took 17 or 18 men to the first defendant's house and said that they were willing to go if the agreement was between them and Mr. Chater. The men also stated that they would like to see the agreement and to show it o somebody before they signed it. Nothing more happened until September 7th. On that data at 8 a.m. I went to the first defendant's house. The men whom I took to him on August 30th were still there, they were living with him. > The reasons for the recal of Made Bezaure have already been exposed in the columns of the Native constable 323, recalled, said-I went Daily Press, and nowhere else, but as it is a subject which is likely to be heard of again, the history may bear a short recapitulation.

M. de Hezaure succeeded to office at a time when French officialdom in North China had been somewhat trailed through the mire. Th Consulate at Tientsin had be a bound hand and foot to what was known as the Freuch syndicate. whose leader like a task master drove the Consul ias with a scourge. Not only were the Consul and his assistants, native and French, made to slave for the syndicate, but they were up carently compelled by their compact, whatever it may have been, to orush its rivals. If M. The final interview was then arranged for Monday, the 16th, when M. Lemaire went to the Yamen to transnot his business. The French papers—and the London and China Express among English papers—announced that the Minister had sucpeeded, but such was not the case. In fact he advanced his various points so timidly, watching the eye of the Vicercy the while for eigns of storm, that it would have been impossible for him to carry the simplest point. He was debarred from, venturing far in the direction of pushing French commercial interests by a sciemn protest. with which he had been served by M. In the matter of mission claims the Minister got no further than to warn the Viceroy against the villains of French missionaries He meant one in particular, who he imagined was an obstacle in his way, and whose credit and influence he thus hoped to destroy. But being afraid to name him be spoke generally of certain French missionaries, leaving the Chinese to apply his strictures at their discretion. As regards the change in the Consulate the Minister volunteered a long vindication of his Governnent's action in recalling M. de Bezaure, giving s the reason the fact that he had been slack in xperion the lapses of a brother official.
